
Even a one-eyed chimp with a cheap digital camera could make good money from this idea!

Hi

Did you know it's possible to earn £600 a week selling your digital snaps to online libraries?

No, nor did I . . . until very recently!

Once again I have to thank my ever-lovely (and incredibly business savvy) wife Heloise for uncovering this one.

You see, as she was searching for a suitable image we needed for a new website, she stumbled across an online digital photo library where you could pick up photos for as little as £1 a pop, rather than the usual £250+ charge we were used to paying for republishing rights.

What's more, you could see how many times the photo had been downloaded. We were amazed - 300, 500, sometime more than a 1,000 downloads at £1 a time within the space of a couple of months.

And here's the great money-making twist . . .

ANYONE can submit their photographs and earn a commission every time one is downloaded. In fact some of the photographs with the most downloads were made by amateurs - certainly not the kind of super slick pro shots you'd expect. Even if you are only taking a small % of that fee, then you can see the raw money-making potential.

After some digging around I realised there was a very real (but completely overlooked) opportunity to make good money from simple, day-to-day photographs - even if you're only experience of photography is taking a few pictures on holiday!

Let me give you a little background on this opportunity so you can see for yourself how compelling an idea it is . . .

A digital photo library is a website where amateur and professional photographers can upload their pictures, putting them in the 'shop window'.

Photo buyers - like newspapers, magazines, website owners, postcard manufacturers and other publishers - can come and browse and download the pics they want.

You get paid for your work, and the site gets a commission for linking you up.

The profit possibilities are endless! As these new types of digital photo libraries operate over the Internet, you have access to buyers worldwide. You earn a fee every time a buyer downloads your photo. With a good photograph that could be thousands of times over the years!

And, better still, it's all automated. Once your photo is uploaded, it works for you day and night, making you money while you do other things.

So what do you need to get started?

Not very much at all to be honest, apart from a bit of time and application.

Of course, you'll need a digital camera. But more or less any digital camera will do, though it's sensible to get the best one you can afford. Most photo libraries only take photos from 2 megapixel cameras and above - pretty basic these days. If you don't already have one I've seen some great used bargains on eBay, starting from around £35!

How much could you make?

It all depends on a few key things: How many photos you have, how much they sell for and how much the site you sell them on charges as a selling fee.

So let's do a back-of-an-envelope calculation based upon conservative figures . . .

Say you had 120 photos on several different sites... each of them working for you day and night... earning an average of £10 a week EACH. You get at least half of that (in many cases much more. I know one library that only charges a 15% commission.)

Just think about it for a moment - that's a passive income of £600 a week - rolling in while you work your day job, go on holiday, potter in the garden... even while you sleep at night.

I won't patronise you by saying what you could do with an extra £31,200 a year in your bank account. I'm sure you know full well what that extra cash would go towards.

I'll be totally honest here. To start with, you might just make £20 to £100 here and there - but remember, this is residual automatic income and costs you zilch once you have taken and uploaded the picture! And over time, as you add more snaps to your online portfolio, your commissions can really start to snowball.

And the beauty is, a good picture will make you money for years to come.

Of course there is more to it, like knowing what kind of picture to take and how to list it on the right sites so that people can find it.

And that's why I've investigated this area and come up with what I think it is the definitive step by step guide to getting started. Take a look here As a relatively new and unknown business opportunity it's impossible to say exactly how it will pan out. But when you think that this blueprint is in no way a 'proper job'. First and foremost it's an enjoyable sideline. And one where, after you've done the basic legwork, you can sit back and watch the cash flowing in. On that basis it's potentially very lucrative indeed.

I don't know about you. But I think it's suddenly time to brush up on my photography skills after all!
